

rial in the Park . . . yet six decades have passed and the job has still to be completed.

But at last a fine start has been made. Major J. S. Matthews, City Archivist, has commissioned a statue (see photo) and has gradually been collecting subscriptions to pay for it.

He still needs $2,000 . . . and while there are a number of people and companies who might be glad to give the sum for such a purpose, Major Matthews doesn't want it done that way. He'd rather have a lot of citizens give small amounts. The statue, like the Park, should belong to everybody, he believes.

If you'd like to contribute . . . a dime, a dollar, ten dollars . . . send it to him at the City Hall.

Vancouver should have that memorial.

Branch Manager Dave King confers with Mrs. Maxine Irwin, Pacific Stage Lines agent, outside the new Bus Depot and B.C. Electric Offices at Langley. The $80,000 depot, fifth completed in the Fraser Valley since the war, opens Monday.

New Depot for Langley

Shortly after 11 a.m. next Monday, Reeve Brooks of Langley Prairie will wield a pair of shears on a ribbon and the new Pacific Stage Lines Bus Depot and B.C. Electric Offices will be officially open.

It's a smart and modern building which makes generous use of brick, plate glass and concrete block — a handsome addition to a rapidly growing community.

For Langley, though it is British Columbia's oldest organized municipality, is by no means resting on the record of its pioneers.
